Not illustrated. 1823 Excerpt: ...concealed there, and not revealed. Now, therefore, it is said to be revealed, we have a right to demand the evidence proper to support its authority, especially as it soars so high above the regions of common sense and literal interpretation. Should it be said that Swedenborg himself had miraculous evidence, for he conversed with angels, even that is nothing to us, unless we, or some credible witnesses, had seen them. We have heard, that he met with glorified saints and angels in the busy streets of London, and there conversed with them; but none but himself thus saw them. It is, therefore, reasonable to believe, (without questioning his veracity) that the scenes passed only in his own mind; as has been frequently the case with persons disordered in a peculiar way. The most charitable conclusion that can be drawn therefore is, that the Baron, a man of deep mystical learning, and, we hope, of sincere piety, was so far deranged in his faculties, as to see and hear things and persons totally invisible to people in their sober senses.--But what shall we say of those who believe in such a man? 3. The " doctrine of correspondences," between the natural and spiritual world, which goes far, very far, beyond the laws of metaphor and type, is so vague and uncertain, that any thing may be made of every tiling; and the Swedenborgians give loose to a latitude of interpretation, as wild as the Jewish Caballa, or the mysteries of Jacob Behmen, and other gross enthusiasts. 4. The arbitrary and fanciful interpretation of the Baron are not brought forward merely to amuse and exercise the minds of curious persons, but they are employed to subvert what Christians in general consider as the most fundamental and important truths of Christianity. To instance a few:--(1)...
